

ABSTRACT

In an optical recording medium having a phase change recording layer, recorded marks having a shortest length of up to 350 nm are formed in the recording layer which contains Sb as a main component. This enables formation of microscopic recorded marks which are stabilized in shape and size. The medium remains reliable in that the microscopic recorded marks are improved in thermal stability.